ABSTRACT: A general review of the current demographic situation in India is presented. It is noted that although a slow decline in the birth rate to 35 per 1,000 population has occurred, the rate of decline in mortality has also decreased, and India has experienced a higher rate of population growth in the past decade than ever previously recorded. The author suggests that the success of the Green Revolution has postponed but not resolved the problems of the provision of adequate food supplies, and he notes the revival of national family planning programs.
